BONUS POINTS
BY HSC SUBJECT

Bonus points add a level of considerable complexity to the whole process of university admission.

They are now such an integral part of the selection process that we have to find a manageable way of dealing with the detail in all its complexities.

Although it is easy to maintain, with some justification, that entry scores are not an appropriate basis for course selection, nevertheless entry scores really matter - and any associated bonus points regimes really matter as well.

The complexities generated by bonus point offerings wouldn't be so bad if there were some readily comprehensible patterns to the bonus point scenarios on offer.

But what we have is an essential inconsistency within many universities and across universities, on a scale that defies any simple rules of thumb that might facilitate working assumptions. This is compounded by some bonus point offerings which are not specifically defined and/or 'are subject to the availability of places', whatever that means.

This guide seeks to make the bonus points syndrome easier to deal with by organising the information across all universities by HSC subject. This is the only relevant starting point for students seeking to come to terms with the impact/potential of bonus points, given their particular choices or subject mix.

The entry scores in this edition are for Main Round offers in January 2012 and are valid until the next round of offers in January 2013.

educational disadvantage

All universities have special admission arrangements for applicants who have experienced long-term educational disadvantage.

In fact, increasing the proportion of students from disadvantaged backgrounds is a primary political agenda of Australian government education policy and Australian universities have accepted this agenda. There are real financial incentives for them to do so!

In order to increase the proportion of students from disadvantaged backgrounds at Australian universities to 20 per cent by 2020, the Federal Government is offering universities additional funding for every disadvantaged student they enrol ($540 in 2010, rising to $1400 in 2013) and encouraging universities to use a broader range of criteria in selecting students.

As a result, special entry programs to Australian universities are going to becoming increasingly important pathways to entry, especially for students from schools and areas which are considered to be disadvantaged.

Some institutions set aside a certain number of places for applicants who have been educationally disadvantaged; other institutions award bonus points to applicants who are considered to have suffered educational disadvantage.

managed by UAC

The major special entry programs - or educational access schemes (EAS) as they are generally called - are managed centrally through UAC.

In August each year UAC publishes the Educational Access Schemes booklet which contains detailed information about the criteria that are used to assess educational disadvantage, application procedures and an application form. This is the basic reference to educational access programs in NSW/ACT.

To be eligible for consideration via educational access programs students are required to demonstrate that their educational performance during Year 11 and/or Year 12 has been seriously affected by circumstances beyond their control.

Applications should be made directly to UAC via the UAC EAS form.

types of disadvantage

Types of disadvantage covered by educational access schemes include:

• disrupted schooling, such as having attended via three or more schools in Years 11 and 12, interstate transfers or missing long periods of schooling for reasons beyond a student's control.

• financial hardship

• severe family disruptions

• excessive family responsibilities

• English language difficulty, although the student must be an Australian or New Zealand citizen or permanent resident

• illness or disability.

In addition, all universities have specific admission schemes for indigenous applicants and for elite athletes and performers.

An elite athlete or performer is a student who has demonstrated excellence through performing, sporting, arts, scholastic achievement or leadership on a national or international level. See page 10.

elite athletes and performers

a tough definition

In terms of the published criteria, universities seem to use the word 'elite' quite seriously in the context of their elite athlete and performers entry schemes- it doesn't mean 'just really good at'!

'Elite Friendly Universities' formally recognise elite athletes as those who have been identified as such by the Australian Institute of Sport, a state institute (or academy) of sport or a relevant national association such as the AFL Players Association, the Australian Cricketers Association or the Rugby Union Players Association.

This definition sets the broad context of the standard of athletic or other elite performance which is generally required for consideration under the special admission categories for athletes and performers – but individual institutions may interpret elite performance in different ways.
